Although people around the world celebrate many of the same events, they sometimes celebrate these special days quite differently. We found some interesting – and unique – traditions for celebrating New Year’s Eve, birthdays, and weddings.

NEW YEAR’S EVE

In Mexico, people celebrate the start of the new year by getting together with friends and family. On New Year’s Eve, they have a special dinner. Then, when the clock midnight, everyone starts eating grapes – one for each month of the next year. A sweet grape means the month is going to be a good one. If a grape is sour, then the month is not going to be so good.

BIRTHDAYS

In China, there’s an interesting birthday tradition for infants. A baby is one year old on the day he or she is born. One year later, friends and relatives get together for the baby’s second birthday. They put several objects in front of the baby, such as some money, a doll, and a book. If the baby picks up the money, it means he or she is going to be wealthy. Reaching for the book means the baby is going to be a teacher, and picking up the doll means the baby is going to have a lot of children one day.

WEDDINGS

Weddings around the world have different traditions, and Venezuela is no exception. Of course, during a wedding ceremony, couples promise that they will always love and take care of each other. However, in Venezuela, the bride and groom don’t always say their promises – sometimes they sing them. Later, during the reception, the bride and groom sneak away. If no one sees them , it means they are going to have good luck in their marriage. And that seems to be something that all these traditions have – they are all meant to bring good luck.

An article on the Internet recently my eye. It was about the Texting Championships in New York City. The 17-year-old winner texted 149 characters in 39 seconds and won $50,000. That is certainly impressive, and much, much faster than me, - LOL :-). However, I started to wonder: Why is there still so much interest in texting? After all, texting is a commonplace activity these days.

It's clear that texting, with all its abbreviations and symbols, is now part of our lives. According to research, about 75% of Americans send text messages, and almost one third prefer to text rather than talk on their phone. It's just quicker to send a text than make a call. Typing SUP is faster than asking "How are you?" and listening to the answer. It's also more discreet because no one can overhear your conversation.

On the other hand, texting has its downsides, too, and perhaps it's these problems that create all the interest. Texters gripe that they are getting more spam texts than ever before. Teachers complain that students' test scores are getting worse because teens spend more time texting than they should. Some also say that texting encourages bad grammar and punctuation and, in my opinion, that's true. Students don't realize they shouldn't write their essays in "textese," and they get low grades as a result. Many young people are sleeping less because they wake up in the night every time a text pops up on their phone. Others have injuries to their hands and thumbs from the constant texting.

There are also more serious problems with texting, however, such as the accidents that happen when people text and drive at the same time. , many countries are passing laws that make it illegal to text when you're behind the wheel of a car. , public service advertisements warn of the dangers of texting while driving. Perhaps, then, there is good reason for all the interest in texting.
